

Acknowledgements

There are many people that I must thank for their contributions, great and small, to my research. My heartfelt gratitude and appreciation go to all of them.

Special thanks to my supervisors Dr Colin Legg and Dr Graham Russell for their patience, encouragement and constraint. To Colin for correcting my occasional Scottisms (is that a word?) and explaining the theories of multi-variate analysis. To Graham for stepping into the role of second supervisor, and bringing with him local knowledge and an understanding of the mysteries of soil science. To both for the very diverse and positive ways they found to explain that what I had just written was a load of tripe and for their incredible stamina in keeping me focussed, particularly during the writing up process.

Long service and good conduct medals, love and hugs to the other major contributors: my long suffering husband Ian who has provided moral support throughout my (many) years of study and also been my personal chauffeur and general dogsbody; sons Ian and Hugh who have learned the intricacies of microwave and washing machine operation and otherwise become totally self-sufficient in the frequent absence of their mother; daughter-in-law Rachel who managed to explain eigenvalues to me; my parents, brothers and sisters and all other family and friends for not laughing out loud when I first announced the subject of my research and forgiving me when I forgot birthdays and anniversaries until three days after the event.

Recognition must also go to the staff and post graduates of the Schools of GeoSciences and Biological Science, past and present, who have shared in small triumphs, deep depressions, drunken parties and more genteel social occasions over the last several years: the other residents of room 117 who have suffered continuous Mozart, Shostakovich and Classic FM for the last six years without (much) complaint; Dr Douglas Malcolm and the late Dr Philip Smith for inspiring me during my undergraduate years and making me realise how much more I wanted to learn; Mr Francois Edwards (postgraduate colleague) who took time from his own research to help with the collection of soil samples and setting of seed traps (unsuccessful);

Mr Bob Astles (retired) for allowing me to grow my ‘weeds’ in his greenhouses and coldframes and tending them with such care; Shiela Wilson, Connie Fox and Helen McKeating the past and present departmental secretaries who have coped admirably with requests for everything from stationery to wine glasses; the servitors Davy, Gordon, Charlie and John for early morning and late evening exchanges on football, life, the universe and everything.

Finally my appreciation to some influential individuals from beyond Edinburgh: Professor Rob Marris of the University of Liverpool for his interest in my research from the earliest stages of my PhD in the form of support, comments and criticisms of posters and papers that I have presented at various conferences; Dr Karel Prach of the University of South Bohemia whose stimulating tour of post-industrial sites in the Czech Republic raised my awareness of the extensive research that is being undertaken in Eastern Europe; Tam Dalyell MP for Linlithgow (previously West Lothian), Father of the House of Commons and Rector of the University of Edinburgh (2004) whose “question” I have used as the short title of the thesis.

To anyone who I have forgotten to name, apologies and thank you - put it down to a “senior moment”.
