I have been lucky, in this project, to work with an excellent group of people. My supervisor, Dr. Thomas Bak, has been enthusiastic and encouraging at every stage. His optimism is largely responsible for the extent and scope of this research, and his discerning eye ensured its relevance – any flights of fancy are my own doing. Just as importantly, right from the beginning he made me feel that I was a part of a research team, and helped me connect with the PhD candidates who were invaluable in the implementation of this research. Mara Sittampalam was unfailingly generous with her time, allowing me to test the patients she recruited, often at no slight inconvenience to herself, and answering my questions with good humour. Phillipa Rewaj kindly gave me the tests she had arduously designed, and helped me to understand exactly what I was testing. That I have greatly enjoyed the process of developing my dissertation is largely due to these three people, and I am pleased to be able to continue my work with them even after it has been handed in.
